Listen to two PhD candidates, who each will discuss their chosen field of research on topics affecting our society on a daily basis.

Liam Quinn is investigating the relationships between legitimate market forces and the theft and disposal of stolen goods. He proposes that variation in prices and consumer demand for legitimate goods are causally related to theft of goods through an overarching supply and demand mechanism in which property crime offenders are driven to steal high-demand, easily disposable goods.

Nicola Stokes' PhD research focuses on intimate partner violence and the Western Australian Criminal Justice System. In a state where incidences of intimate partner violence are increasing, it is necessary to ask if the justice system motivates victims of intimate partner violence to remove themselves from further abuse or whether the system inhibits victims from moving forward.
